Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: .of such a nature that Tom was terrified almost out of his mind. Tell your aunt you ve made up your mind to go, and you won t be turned from it, and when the old girl sees that you re determined she ll come round, he urged; and when Tom shook his head disconsolately, and said it wouldn t do, and if it would he wasn t going to talk to Aunt Tabby like that, Mr. Jennings went through an expressive pantomime, representing himself as suffering from something very tightly drawn round his neck and apparently causing him agonies of suffocation. This little display seemed to afford him a great deal of amusement, for he laughed very heartily over it;-but to poor Tom it was something more than a joke, and drove him almost frantic. It was no wonder the boy s natural gaiety was gone, that his favourite pursuits failed to charm him, or that his anxious, careworn face should attract the attention and alarm of those who loved him. He was afraid to go out, he was afraid to stay in the house; the very sight of a policeman filled him with a vague terror, and if by any chance one happened to loiter near the gate his face would blanch, his knees tremble, and a cold perspiration break out on him, from the intense agony of mind he suffered. He felt that he could not bear it much longer; that it would...
