Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: . . . should I make the remark now, were it not that Lord Campbell has upheld the former judgment without even a superficial review of the evidence, though the many acknowledgments which I have received, not only from friends but strangers, of the conviction of innocence which these pages have produced, prove that to absolve Mr. Barber from reproach it is only necessary to understand his case. God forbid that I should draw from this omission any inference to the derogation of judicial impartiality. I repudiate such an unworthy idea; but it is not indecorous to remark that the very impossibility of thus accounting for the omission, proves that the evidence, and therefore the real merits of the case, have never yet been understood by the Court. Are my arguments sustained by the facts Even the bitterest of Mr. Barbers opponents has never disputed my statement of the...
